THE BOY DIVER will be commenced Next Week.

STREET AND SMITH'S
NEW YORK WEEKLY
A JOURNAL OF USEFUL KNOWLEDGE

New York, June 22, 1874.

Panchet, the Pawn; or, the Secret of Castle-Chase.
By Frank H. Strother.

"Girl, where did you get that ring?" asked Margaret Gregory, suddenly.

Chapters II.

(Continued from last week.)

"I'm not sure, but the old lady said she saw you there."

(Caughter of a King.)

"I've never seen a man with a beard so nice as yours."

Chapters III.

The secret of Castle-Chase has been revealed.

(To be continued.)

New York, June 22, 1874.
A ROMANCE OF SOUTHERN SOCIETY.

The Shadow of Sin.

By Madame Gonneau (Walton, Esq.)

CHAPTER XXXI.

A visit of the Devere to a neighboring village, in a part of the country where they were not known, gave them an opportunity of observing the manners of the people, and of discovering some curious facts respecting their social and domestic life.

The Devere, who were always fond of novelty, took great pleasure in this excursion, and were much struck with the simplicity and honesty of the inhabitants, who seemed to live in perfect harmony with nature, and to enjoy life to the full. They were simple in their tastes, and contented with the means of subsistence furnished by the soil, without seeking to improve it, or to increase their stock of possessions.

The Devere, who were always fond of novelty, took great pleasure in this excursion, and were much struck with the simplicity and honesty of the inhabitants, who seemed to live in perfect harmony with nature, and to enjoy life to the full. They were simple in their tastes, and contented with the means of subsistence furnished by the soil, without seeking to improve it, or to increase their stock of possessions.

The Devere, who were always fond of novelty, took great pleasure in this excursion, and were much struck with the simplicity and honesty of the inhabitants, who seemed to live in perfect harmony with nature, and to enjoy life to the full. They were simple in their tastes, and contented with the means of subsistence furnished by the soil, without seeking to improve it, or to increase their stock of possessions.

The Devere, who were always fond of novelty, took great pleasure in this excursion, and were much struck with the simplicity and honesty of the inhabitants, who seemed to live in perfect harmony with nature, and to enjoy life to the full. They were simple in their tastes, and contented with the means of subsistence furnished by the soil, without seeking to improve it, or to increase their stock of possessions.

The Devere, who were always fond of novelty, took great pleasure in this excursion, and were much struck with the simplicity and honesty of the inhabitants, who seemed to live in perfect harmony with nature, and to enjoy life to the full. They were simple in their tastes, and contented with the means of subsistence furnished by the soil, without seeking to improve it, or to increase their stock of possessions.

The Devere, who were always fond of novelty, took great pleasure in this excursion, and were much struck with the simplicity and honesty of the inhabitants, who seemed to live in perfect harmony with nature, and to enjoy life to the full. They were simple in their tastes, and contented with the means of subsistence furnished by the soil, without seeking to improve it, or to increase their stock of possessions.

The Devere, who were always fond of novelty, took great pleasure in this excursion, and were much struck with the simplicity and honesty of the inhabitants, who seemed to live in perfect harmony with nature, and to enjoy life to the full. They were simple in their tastes, and contented with the means of subsistence furnished by the soil, without seeking to improve it, or to increase their stock of possessions.

The Devere, who were always fond of novelty, took great pleasure in this excursion, and were much struck with the simplicity and honesty of the inhabitants, who seemed to live in perfect harmony with nature, and to enjoy life to the full. They were simple in their tastes, and contented with the means of subsistence furnished by the soil, without seeking to improve it, or to increase their stock of possessions.

The Devere, who were always fond of novelty, took great pleasure in this excursion, and were much struck with the simplicity and honesty of the inhabitants, who seemed to live in perfect harmony with nature, and to enjoy life to the full. They were simple in their tastes, and contented with the means of subsistence furnished by the soil, without seeking to improve it, or to increase their stock of possessions.

The Devere, who were always fond of novelty, took great pleasure in this excursion, and were much struck with the simplicity and honesty of the inhabitants, who seemed to live in perfect harmony with nature, and to enjoy life to the full. They were simple in their tastes, and contented with the means of subsistence furnished by the soil, without seeking to improve it, or to increase their stock of possessions.

The Devere, who were always fond of novelty, took great pleasure in this excursion, and were much struck with the simplicity and honesty of the inhabitants, who seemed to live in perfect harmony with nature, and to enjoy life to the full. They were simple in their tastes, and contented with the means of subsistence furnished by the soil, without seeking to improve it, or to increase their stock of possessions.

The Devere, who were always fond of novelty, took great pleasure in this excursion, and were much struck with the simplicity and honesty of the inhabitants, who seemed to live in perfect harmony with nature, and to enjoy life to the full. They were simple in their tastes, and contented with the means of subsistence furnished by the soil, without seeking to improve it, or to increase their stock of possessions.

The Devere, who were always fond of novelty, took great pleasure in this excursion, and were much struck with the simplicity and honesty of the inhabitants, who seemed to live in perfect harmony with nature, and to enjoy life to the full. They were simple in their tastes, and contented with the means of subsistence furnished by the soil, without seeking to improve it, or to increase their stock of possessions.

The Devere, who were always fond of novelty, took great pleasure in this excursion, and were much struck with the simplicity and honesty of the inhabitants, who seemed to live in perfect harmony with nature, and to enjoy life to the full. They were simple in their tastes, and contented with the means of subsistence furnished by the soil, without seeking to improve it, or to increase their stock of possessions.

The Devere, who were always fond of novelty, took great pleasure in this excursion, and were much struck with the simplicity and honesty of the inhabitants, who seemed to live in perfect harmony with nature, and to enjoy life to the full. They were simple in their tastes, and contented with the means of subsistence furnished by the soil, without seeking to improve it, or to increase their stock of possessions.

The Devere, who were always fond of novelty, took great pleasure in this excursion, and were much struck with the simplicity and honesty of the inhabitants, who seemed to live in perfect harmony with nature, and to enjoy life to the full. They were simple in their tastes, and contented with the means of subsistence furnished by the soil, without seeking to improve it, or to increase their stock of possessions.

The Devere, who were always fond of novelty, took great pleasure in this excursion, and were much struck with the simplicity and honesty of the inhabitants, who seemed to live in perfect harmony with nature, and to enjoy life to the full. They were simple in their tastes, and contented with the means of subsistence furnished by the soil, without seeking to improve it, or to increase their stock of possessions.

The Devere, who were always fond of novelty, took great pleasure in this excursion, and were much struck with the simplicity and honesty of the inhabitants, who seemed to live in perfect harmony with nature, and to enjoy life to the full. They were simple in their tastes, and contented with the means of subsistence furnished by the soil, without seeking to improve it, or to increase their stock of possessions.
THE NEW YORK WEEKLY.