CHAPTER XXXI.

SANDY WHITING.

The next day was a clear, bright, and sunny one, and the whalers were all on deck, busily engaged in preparing for the voyage. The captain had ordered the boat to be taken in, and the provisions were being stowed away in the hold, under the supervision of the first mate. The crew were busy with the tackles and rigging, and the sails were being hauled up on the mast, ready for hoisting. The ship's company were all in high spirits, looking forward to the prospect of a successful cruise.

The captain gave the signal for the boats to be rowed out, and the crew manned the oars, ready to set sail at any moment. The ship's company were all on deck, watching the scene with interest, as the boats were rowed towards the open sea. The captain gave the order to hoist the sails, and the ship moved slowly forward, the sails catching the wind and filling out to the full.

As the ship moved forward, the crew continued to work, setting the sails and the rigging, and the ship moved steadily towards its destination. The crew were all in high spirits, looking forward to the prospect of a successful cruise.
